A BUDDHIST SŪTRA'S TRANSFORMATION INTO A DAOIST TEXT

Stephan Peter Bumbacher, Universities of Tübingen and Zürich

for Robert H. Gassmann, at his 60th birthday

Abstract

Daoism and Chinese Buddhism interacted in complex ways over the last two millenia. However, the precise nature of this two-way exchange still awaits a systematic investigation. Since the early 1980s, the Buddhist impact on lingbao-Daoism has become evident. Recently, it was suggested that the developing Daoist monasticism of fifth century Southern China may also have been influenced by the then already existing Buddhist one. Of special interest are Daoist texts that predate the lingbao-corpus and show some form of Buddhist influence as they might have had an impact on the latter. As a possible point of departure, an analysis of Yang Xi's adaptation of the Buddhist Forty-two sections of Buddhist sutras is offered. It shows that already a generation earlier than Ge Chaofu's lingbao scriptures Daoists not only had first hand knowledge of Buddhism but even made verbatim use of their scriptures to their own ends. As a by-product of this analysis, it is even possible to emend the received version of the Forty-two sections of Buddhist sutras where it apparently is defective.

1. Introduction

The first four centuries of the common era witnessed not only the arrival of some forms of Buddhism in China, this was also the formative period of several traditions of Daoism, the indigenous Chinese Hochreligion.<sup>1</sup> Both were essentially different: whereas the Buddhists sought to get out of samsāra by entering nirvāṇa or final extinction, the Daoists aimed at becoming immortals – either earthly immortals who would live on on earth for centuries, now and then changing their whereabouts and altering their social identities, or heavenly immortals who would ascend heaven in broad daylight in order to integrate themselves into the heavenly hierarchy.

1 An early version of this article was presented at the XVth EACS European Association of Chinese Studies Conference, Heidelberg, August 25–29, 2004.

Nevertheless, from the very beginning both religions influenced each other in various and complex ways. One of the reasons for this was that both competed with each other to win influence on the élite. Quite often when a monk found himself immersed in a discussion with some members of the court or high officials, he was confronted with Daoist notions and was asked whether or not the Buddhists had a similar concept. The same was true the other way round. The following example, taken from a Daoist source of the sixth century reporting events of earlier times, may give an impression of it:

Before that, when he (Lu Xiuqing, [406–477]) had reached Jiujiang<sup>2</sup>, the Prince of Jiujiang asked about the pros and cons as well as identical and different [points between] Daoism and Buddhism. The Master answered: “In Buddhism there is the liu qin<sup>3</sup>, in Daoism there is the Jade Sovereign<sup>4</sup>; these, however, by different roads lead to the same result, and that is all.” The princes and dukes praised [this as] good.

[...] The Son of Heaven then commanded the ‘minister of education’, the Prince of Jian’an,<sup>5</sup> and the ‘director of the imperial secretariat’, Yuan Can,<sup>6</sup> to provide the ceremony of a large banquet, to set up a platform for summoning the worthies, to invite all the accomplished gentlemen of the court, to widely gather the present-day [men of] excellence, and to assemble [them] at the Buddha-Monastery of the Ornament [of the Soul] (Zhuangyan Fo Si 莊嚴佛寺). At that occasion, the ‘scholars of the dark talk’ vigorously debated the He [shang gong] commentary [to the Daode jing]; the vastly learned śramaṇas [as their] opponents in discussion sharp-pointedly put forth [their counter-arguments]; argued back and forth the [teachings of] Laozi and [of] Śākyamuni,<sup>7</sup> competing in mutually questioning and arguing [against each other]. The Master marked [their] principles and disciplined [their] statements, untied [their] confusions and smoothed [their] sharp edges. The princes and dukes sighed and tapped in admiration, and those near and distant were pleased and submitted [to his arguments]. When the session was finished they submitted a report to the Lord ruling over the people<sup>8</sup>. Within ten days, [the emperor] again requested [that they] assemble, but this time in the ‘Lodging-house of the Invited Worthies’ in the [imperial]

3 留秦, although this seems to be a rather important expression – according to the fragment’s context – I have not yet been able to identify it. As it is presented here in parallel with the Daoists’ highest god 玉皇, it accordingly should indicate the highest divine being in Buddhism.

4 玉皇 or 玉皇上帝, is the God of Heaven, 天帝, the chief of the Daoist pantheon, cf. MASPERO 1981:88–91 et passim.

5 Liu Xiuren 劉休仁 (432–470). His official biography is in Song shu 宋書, ed. Zhonghua shuju, Beijing 1974, 72.1871–1878.

6 420–477. Official biography in Song shu 89.2229–2234.

7 李釋, lit.: “Li” and “Shi”. “Li” stands for Laozi, “Shi” is short for Shi jia mou ni 釋迦牟尼.

8 The emperor.

Hualin [park]. The emperor went out to attend in person. When the princes and dukes had fully gathered, and the Master wearing a deer head-cloth, ascended [the throne-platform], in order to pay his respectful visit to the emperor, the Son of Heaven sat gravely with enhanced respect, and personally asked about the dao and inquired about the utmost object of veneration. The Master pointedly explained the 'gate of the mysteries'<sup>9</sup>, exhaustingly expounded samsāra (?)<sup>10</sup>, and went to the infinitesimal as well as to all patterns of the mysterious without exception. The emperor's heart was pleased about it. The princes and dukes, too, asked: "We have not heard the Daoists (道家) explaining the 'three periods'<sup>11</sup>." The Master replied: "The scripture says: 'I don't know whose son [it]<sup>12</sup> is, [but] it images the forefather of God.'<sup>13</sup> When there already is a before, there presumably will be an after. When there is a before and an after, there will presumably be a middle. Zhuangzi says: 'No sooner is one born than one is dying.'<sup>14</sup> Both these [quotations] elucidate the three periods. But their words are terse and their principles are mysterious [so] the world was not yet able to apprehend it!" While the emperor<sup>15</sup> wanted to compel him [to stay] by [bestowing on him] honours, the Master gazed into the distance and was not interested<sup>16</sup>. [...]<sup>17</sup>

In such situations Daoists had to know Buddhist concepts and had to be able to relate them to their own ones. Similarly, Buddhists had to be acquainted with Daoist notions. Both picked up and adopted aspects of the other's systems as it seemed suitable. We should not forget that there also existed an economic competition between both over the control of ritual services which "certainly resulted in much of the shared vocabulary and doctrinal coincidence we find in the texts left to us".<sup>18</sup> A culmination was reached when the Daoist lingbao-(靈寶) tradition towards the end of the fourth century AD almost wholesale copied Buddhist sūtras into texts of their own corpus.<sup>19</sup>

9 This may be an allusion to Daode jing A1 and thus a metaphor for the dao.

10 流統. I have not yet found another reference for this expression. Probably 流統 stands for 流轉, the usual Chinese translation of the term samsāra.

11 三世, refers to the principle of karmic retribution which is known as 三世因果, "cause and effect of the three periods", which sets the retributive sequence through past, present and future.

12 S.c.: the dao.

13 Daode jing A.4.

14 Zhuangzi 2.

15 朝廷, original meaning "the Court", here obviously used in a derived meaning: the inhabitant of the court, the emperor.

While the investigation of the history of Buddho-Daoist interactions still is a desideratum, we should like to offer in the following but a small contribution to this wide and vastly and unexplored field.

2. The Buddhist version of the 佛經四十二章 Forty-two sections of Buddhist sūtras

The Sūtra of Forty-two sections 四十二章經 is traditionally considered the oldest extant Chinese Buddhist text. In fact, this is already hinted at in the first chapter of Huijiao's (497–554) 慧皎 Gaoseng zhuan 高僧傳 (Biographies of eminent Buddhist monks), where it is said that Kāśyapa Mātanga during the reign of Han Mingdi (r. 57–75) came to China as “the first of the śramaṇas in China” (漢地有沙門之始也) but did not preach as there were not yet any converts (但大法初傳未有歸信. 故蘊其深解無所宣述) – and “according to a record translated the Sūtra of Forty-two sections in one juan” (有記云. 騰譯四十二章經一卷).<sup>20</sup> The claim is, however, made explicit in Gaoseng zhuan's biography of Dharmaratna. Here we learn that of the first five Buddhist texts originally brought to China only the Sūtra of Forty-two sections actually still exists, containing roughly two thousand words, of all sūtras extant on Chinese soil this is the first one (唯四十二章經今見在. 可二千餘言. 漢地見存諸經. 唯此為始也).<sup>21</sup>

This received title is, however, not only not the original one but it is also misleading. Sūtras usually begin with the opening formula “thus I have heard” (如此我聞) which then is followed by a statement of the form “once the Enlightened One was preaching at such-and-such a place” to which the list of the most prominent members of his audience is added. While our text also begins with a kind of introduction, its form is entirely different from the traditional opening sequence of a sūtra, as will be shown shortly. In fact, not only all early references call our text 佛經四十二章 (Forty-two sections of Buddhist sūtras) or similar<sup>22</sup>, but the text itself refers to “forty-two sections” as it says: “They wrote down (or: copied) forty-two sections of selected Buddhist sūtras” (寫取 佛經四十二章).<sup>23</sup> The designation sūtra or jing 經 seems to have been given to this text during the Tang dynasty, in order to make evident the prestige of this text also in its title.

The earliest extant edition<sup>24</sup> apparently is that of the Korean Buddhist canon of 1251<sup>25</sup> on which the Taishō shinshū daizōkyō edition, edited by Takakusu Junjiro, Tokyo 1924–1932, is based.

The text consists of two parts of unequal length, namely an introductory narrative relating Han Emperor Ming's famous dream of a golden person surrounded by a halo who flew to his palace and who was later identified as the Buddha. Upon learning who this golden person was, the emperor spiritually awoke and sent messengers to the west who eventually brought the text to China. As a consequence of which stūpas and monasteries were erected and Buddhism vastly expanded. The second part of the text, on the other hand, contains forty-two sections including the Buddha's instructions on precepts, proper conduct and ethical behaviour to be observed by the monks.

Both parts seem to have originated at different times. Most scholars agree that the introductory narrative must have been written after the Han dynasty but before ca. AD 300, most probably around 250.<sup>26</sup> The main text, however, must be older: There exists indeed an unmarked early quotation in the famous memorial submitted by the scholar Xiang Kai 襄楷 in AD 166.<sup>27</sup> It may be useful to give the relevant phrases in a synopsis:

Synopsis of the relevant phrases of Xiang Kai's memorial and the corresponding passage of the received version of the Forty-two sections of Buddhist sūtras

HHS	天神遺以	好女，	浮屠	曰此但	革囊盛血

25 On the Korean Buddhist canon, cf. LANCASTER 1979:ix–xvii.

26 ZÜRCHER 1959:22.

27 Hou Han shu 後漢書 30B:1082. Zürcher speaks of “two quotations from the ‘Sūtra in Forty-two Sections’” (ZÜRCHER 1959:38). However, the second “quotation”, in my view at least, deviates too much from the corresponding sentence in the Buddhist original to be termed a quotation. The original sentence reads: “[the shamen] under a mulberry tree stays over night once” 樹下一宿, whereas Xiang Kai's memorial has: “The Buddha did not sleep three nights under the [same] mulberry tree” 浮屠不三宿桑下.

Xiang Kai's sentences may be rendered as: "A heavenly spirit presented [him] with a beautiful girl, [but] the Buddha said: 'This is no more than a bag of skin filled with blood.'" The received version of the Forty-two sections, on the other hand, reads: "A heavenly spirit offered a jade girl to the Buddha, wanting to test the Buddha's mind and examine the Buddha's Way. [But] the Buddha said: 'This is no more than a bag of skin full of dirt.'"

Provided that Xiang Kai is quoting literally – which by no means can be taken as for granted – and given the present state of knowledge, we cannot decide whether he has abridged the text or whether the additional phrases in the received version are later interpolations. Be it as it may, collating both versions we notice immediately two things: firstly, Xiang Kai's quotation still uses the term fou tu 浮屠 as the very early transliteration for Buddha which later became fo 佛 in Chinese. And secondly, the textus receptus differs in a few instances from the earlier one. In any case, this quotation would provide us with a terminus ante quem for the main text in its original form, namely AD 166.

3. Introductory narrative

The earliest direct quotation of the introductory narrative is to be found in Sengyou's 僧祐 Chu sanzang ji ji 出三藏記集 (Collection of excerpts from the Tripiṭaka), first published in 515 and revised in 518, which calls it a "preface" 序.<sup>28</sup> Collation of the received version and that of the Chu sanzang ji ji (CSZJJ, for short) reveals that both are identical except two characters: the name Fu Yi 傅毅 is in the CSZJJ given as Chuan Yi 傳毅 and the received version has a di 第 in the expression 在第十四石函中 which is lacking in CSZJJ:

Synopsis of the received version of the introductory narrative and CSZJJ's version

CSZJJ 臣妾者. 不可稱數國內清寧. 含識之類. 蒙恩受賴. 于今不絕也.

If the textus receptus of this narrative section represented indeed the original text, the CSZJJ ought to be considered a trustful witness. However, turning to the indirect quotations it becomes evident that the original version of this introductory narrative must have been different from the received version and that, most probably, the latter was at some time altered on the basis of the CSZJJ version.

There are two early indirect quotations. One is integrated into the Buddhist Mouzi or, more precisely, Mouzi's Lihuo lun 牟子理惑論 (Master Mou, On removing the doubts), the other is contained within the Daoist Zhen gao 真誥 (Declarations of the perfected). As to the Mouzi, its date of composition is still not quite clear. The Mouzi is preserved in Sengyou's 僧祐 (435–518) Hongming ji 弘明集 (Collection of [essays relating the] expansion and elucidation [of Buddhism]).<sup>29</sup> As the Mouzi refers to Prince Sudāna whose story is taken from the Vessantara jātaka<sup>30</sup> the earliest version of which was translated into Chinese some time between 247 and 280,<sup>31</sup> this gives us a datum post quem. On the other hand, the Mouzi was included in Lu Cheng's 陸澄 (425–494) collection of Chinese Buddhist literature, the Fa lun 法論 which was compiled shortly after 465.<sup>32</sup> So it must have been written somewhere between 247 and 465. However, we were able to gather evidence that the received version of the Mouzi may have been altered at some time during its transmission. There exist three Mouzi quotations which, including by chance the passage which is relevant for our purposes, differ from the received version:

30 KEENAN 1994:106.

31 ZÜRCHER 1959:14.

32 ZÜRCHER 1959:13.

The first is to be found in Liu Jun's 劉峻 (462–521) commentary to Liu Yiqing's 劉義慶 (403–444) Shishuo xinyu 世說新語 (New account of tales of the world).<sup>33</sup> The second appears in Li Shan's 李善 (c. 630–689) commentary to Xiao Tong's 蕭統 (501–531) Wen Xuan 文選 (Selections of [refined] literature)<sup>34</sup> which was also copied into the Taiping yulan<sup>35</sup>. The most important quotation, however, is that in the anonymous Lidai fa bao ji 歷代法寶記 (Historical record of the law)<sup>36</sup> of ca. 780. It contains phrases that are no longer seen in the textus receptus of the Mouzi but appear, at least partially, also in the Shishuo xinyu quotation or in the Wen xuan quotation, which makes it quite likely that these sentences were part of the original Mouzi – and not interpolations of the Lidai fa bao ji – but were later either deliberately eliminated or accidentally lost. This is, at least in my view, a clear indication that the Mouzi has been subject to alterations during its transmission.

Let us present in a synopsis the passage as preserved in the received Mouzi, the Mouzi-quotation of the Shishuo xinyu commentary, that of the Wen xuan commentary and the Mouzi-quotation of the Lidai fa bao ji:

Whereas both the Shishuo xinyu commentary and the Wen xuan commentary are abridging the text they are quoting but, on the other hand, are complementing each other, it is the Lidai fa bao ji which gives the passage in full. We may now attempt to tentatively reconstruct the original version of the Lihuo lun passage in question:

The other early indirect quotation of the introductory narrative of the Forty-two sections appears among the Daoist Yang Xi's 楊羲 (330–386?) texts – written between AD 364 and 370 – that were collected by Tao Hongjing 陶弘景 (456–536) in his Zhen gao 真誥 (Declarations of the perfected) of 499.

The Zhen gao is divided into seven books with a further subdivision into 20 卷 juan. The first five books, or juan 1–16, collect what the Perfected had revealed to the Daoist medium and “private religious specialist” to the Xu 許 family, Yang Xi 楊羲 (330–?) during the years 364–370. The sixth book contains letters, memoranda, and accounts of dreams recorded by Yang and the Xu family members themselves, “while they still dwelt in the world of men”<sup>37</sup>. Whereas the texts preserved within the first six books are all accompanied by Tao Hongjing's running commentary, the seventh book represents Tao's own editorial preface, in which he gives “a meticulous account of the manuscript components of the work”, his “reconstruction of their textual history, and a reasoned genealogy of the Xu family”.<sup>38</sup>

In juan nine we find the introductory narrative of the Forty-two sections. In his commentary to the passage, Tao Hongjing asserts that it is identical with the Buddhist text (wai shu 外書): 此說粗與外書同. We will now have to assess this statement.

37 STRICKMANN 1977:4.

38 Loc. cit.

Collating the Zhen gao version of the introductory narrative with the received version of the Forty-two sections we indeed find that, on the one hand, both versions agree to a large extent but, on the other, that there exists a series of differences between both:

This synopsis shows whole phrases that do occur in the Zhen gao but are absent in the received Buddhist version. Are these interpolations made by Yang Xi's hand? Of special interest are two sentences, namely:

1) The second phrase of 作佛形像, 及鬼子母圖 “they made an image of the shape of the Buddha, and a picture of Hārītī”. Note that the name guizimu 鬼子母 or Hārītī is not found in the Daoist literature, while it is quite prominent in the Buddhist texts from the Samyuktāgama to the Lotus sūtra. Hārītī was “a woman who having vowed to devour all the babies at Rājagṛha was reborn as a female ghost (rākṣasī), and gave birth to 500 children, one of which she was to devour every day. Converted by Śākyamuni she entered a convent. Her image is to be seen in all nunneries.”<sup>39</sup> According to the CSZJJ there existed also a Hārītī sūtra. It is, therefore, quite likely that the “portrait of Hārītī” must have already been in the version of the Forty-two sections of Buddhist sūtras Yang Xi was using but in later versions was eliminated for unknown reasons. We thus may emend the received Forty-two sections of Buddhist sūtras accordingly.

2) The second sentence that is unique in Yang Xi's version reads: 佛像來中國. 始自明帝時耳 “that pictures of the Buddha came to China started from Mingdi's time on”. These phrases could be both, either a comment added by Yang Xi himself, or it could have been part of the early version of the Forty-two sections which was dropped (or lost) in later versions.

Apart from some variorum readings, all other apparent additions are most likely not expansions or complements made by Yang Xi – they may rather represent an earlier state of the text, still including parts that were discarded in later versions of the Buddhist version. To test this hypothesis, let us collate Yang Xi's version (ZG) with the reconstructed Mouzi version (LHL r) and with the Buddhist textus receptus (42).

This synopsis reveals that certain phrases that are lacking in the introductory narrative of the received Forty-two sections but are to be seen in the Zhen gao and could, accordingly, be considered inventions made by Yang Xi in fact also occur in the Lihuo lun. They, therefore, most certainly must have been part of the original version. These phrases include: 身有白光 “his body has a white light [surrounding it]”, 祕蘭臺石室 “he secreted [it] in the Stone Chamber at Lantai [in Luoyang]”, then 又於南宮清涼臺作佛形像 “moreover, he had an image of the Buddha’s shape made in the Qingjing tower of the Southern Palace” and, finally, the passage 帝感非常. 先造壽陵. 亦於殿上作佛象. 是時國豐民安 “the Emperor’s influence is not a constant one. [Therefore,] he earlier had [his] tomb built [in preparation for his death] and on top of [its] temple he had an image of the Buddha made. During that time, the realm prospered and the people were at peace.”

However, we still are left with the Zhen gao phrases 夢見神人. 身長丈六 “in a dream he saw a spirit person [whose] body was ‘of the ten feet measure six times’ long”. As the awkwardness of this English translation indicates, there must be something wrong with the second part of this passage. In fact, measures such as chang 丈 (ten feet) are usually preceded by the numeral. The correct reading of this passage which, as its source is older than the Zhen gao, corroborates the hypothesis that the Zhen gao has not expanded the text but kept to its source, can be found in another text: In the late years of the third or the first years of the fourth century a certain Wang Fou 王浮 compiled a work entitled Hua hu jing 化胡經 (Scripture of the conversion of the barbarians), originally in one juan.<sup>40</sup> In one of the preserved fragments, to be found in Zhen Luan's 甄鸞 (fl. 570) Xiao dao lun 笑道論 (On laughing at Dao[ism]),<sup>41</sup> an indirect quotation of our text is to be seen which says: 明帝夢神人. 長一丈六尺. “Emperor Ming in a dream saw a spirit person [whose] body was sixteen feet (one chang and six chi) long”.<sup>42</sup> If this indeed represents the original reading, then – due to a scribal error – in the Zhen gao version the numeral yi – must have been lost during its transmission process. We have thus good reason to believe that both the (reconstructed) Lihuo lun and the Zhen gao still have the original text of the introductory narrative of the Forty-two sections, although abbreviated. We may thus venture to suggest a reconstruction of the narrative part of the Forty-two sections.

4. Reconstruction of the introductory narrative

Based on the received version of the Forty-two sections, the reconstructed Lihuo lun, the Zhen gao and CSZJJ the following reconstruction can be proposed which we put side by side with the textus receptus:

40 On this text and its complex development until it was destroyed on imperial demand and on its author cf. ZÜRCHER 1959:293–298.

41 A complete English translation with introduction was published by KOHN 1995. For a review, cf. BUMBACHER 1996.

43 It cannot be ruled out that the phrase 有金色 is a later interpolation as it only occurs in the received Forty-two sections and in the CSZJJ.

44 Preferring the lectio difficilior 之 over the lectio facillior 至.

45 Instead of 立佛寺 the received Forty-two sections and CSZJJ have 立塔寺. 於是道法流布. 處處修, which might well be a later interpolation.

We now have to ask how Yang Xi has dealt with this narrative part of the Forty-two sections. Collating both the reconstructed version of the narrative part and its quotation in the Zhen gao makes evident that Yang Xi's version shows alterations only at four insignificant, as it seems, places. The phrase 項有日光 "the nape of [his] neck had a sunny light [surrounding it]" became 項生圓光 "the nape of [his] neck brought forth a nimbus" (reading 圓光兒 for 圓光, which – as the nimbus was introduced into China by the Buddhists – may even preserve an earlier reading of the Buddhist version than its reconstruction). In Yang's version the emperor does not ask "all ministers" (群臣) but he asks "the court" (朝廷) about his dream. Then after the phrase 有得道者. 號曰佛 "[...] there is someone who has obtained the Way. [His] name is Fo" Yang inserted 傳聞 "Fu [Yi] has [further] heard that [...]". And finally, the passage 寫取佛經四十二章 "they copied forty-two sections of selected Buddhist sūtras" he changed into 採寫佛經四十二章 "they selected and copied forty-two sections of Buddhist sūtras", thus emphasizing even stronger what the reader of the Forty-two sections has sensed anyway: that the main body of the text must be some sort of pastiche compiled from various Buddhists texts.

In other words, Yang saw no necessity to change much of this Buddhist text whose religious provenance was evident anyway. He rather omitted parts not considered relevant for his purposes. Accordingly, the main differences between both versions consist of a series of abbreviations Yang Xi had made. That the Zhen gao version lacks the phrase 有金色 "[whose body] had a golden hue" does not necessarily mean that Yang Xi purged it. It is well possible, as mentioned earlier, that this phrase is a later interpolation. On the other hand, most probably intentional omissions include passages like 於其壁畫朝廷千乘萬騎繞塔三匝 "on its walls they painted the emperor, a thousand chariots and ten thousand riders [who] were circumambulating the stūpa three times" and 及開陽城門上 "as well as above the Kaiyang wall gate [they made images]" that provide the reader with specific information concerning localities in northern China, in and around the capital Luoyang. As Yang Xi delivered his writings to an audience resident in southern China, such detailed descriptions of sites from another part of the country that, furthermore, was no longer accessible as it now was under the control of foreigners, may not have been considered of great interest.

The other pieces of the text disregarded by Yang comprise sentences that describe the positive effects Buddhism had on the barbarians, such as 咸來歸德 "[the foreign tribes] came altogether and returned to virtue", or 以爲億數 "[those who wished to serve the Buddha] were considered amounting to more than a hundred thousand” and they contain phrases characterizing the development of Buddhism on Chinese soil like 故諡曰明也。自是之後。京城左右及州縣處處各有佛寺。學者由此而滋 “therefore, [the Emperor] was given the posthumous title ‘the enlightened’ (ming). After this time, everywhere [in] the neighbourhood of the capital as well as in the regions and districts every [place] had [its] Buddhist monastery, the learners [of the dharma] hence increased” and 國內清寧。含識之類。蒙恩受賴。于今不絕也 “the interior of the country became pure and tranquil and [all] kinds of sentient beings received [this] favour with gratitude and obtained [something they could] trust to. Until today it has not ceased to be so”.

In analysing the narrative part of the Forty-two sections we in fact did not so much detect a new or specific Daoist reading of it – but thanks to this very early quotation in a Daoist text we were able to emend the received version and reconstruct the original one. Things, however, change considerably when we now turn towards the main textual body of the Forty-two sections.

5. Main text

As early as in 1933 Hu Shih identified twenty sections of the Sūtra of 42 sections as also appearing in the Zhen gao 真誥 and presented thirteen of them side by side with their Daoist counterpart.<sup>46</sup> In 1936 T’ang Yung-t’ung 湯用彤 observed that, in fact, almost half of the main body of the Buddhist text can also be found in the Zhen gao.<sup>47</sup> However, close examination of the Zhen gao reveals that it does not contain twenty, as Hu and T’ang maintained, but, in fact, twenty-five sections. Also note that both apparently overlooked (or did not take into account) that the introductory narrative, as we have seen, also can be found in the Zhen gao, although in a different chapter.

In general, T’ang was not interested in the Daoist aspects of these “borrowings” but he used the Zhen gao version to show that the Korean edition of Forty-two sections of Buddhist sūtras preserves an earlier reading than the other editions he investigated. Later, Isabelle Robinet as well as Stephen

Bokenkamp mentioned the Zhen gao's connection with the Forty-two sections, although without examining in any detail the relationship between the two.<sup>48</sup>

6. The Daoist version

In juan six of the Zhen gao almost half of the main text of the Forty-two sections is to be found, although in an edited version. Differences and identical passages will become immediately obvious when we list both texts in a synopsis, which is arranged according to the Zhen gao sequence of the sections:

It is in this main body of the Forty-two sections that the most important differences between the Buddhist and the Daoist versions are seen. First of all, the Daoist version is a recent and direct transmission the gods passed on or, more probably, orally dictated to Yang Xi – as it says right at the beginning: “The Lord Green Youth of [the Isle of] Fangzhu visited [me] and declared [...] (方諸青童見告曰)”. In contrast to the Buddhist version which was an anthology of extracts of Buddhist scriptures made, as the tradition of the initial narrative part has it, by the members of the expedition sent to India by Emperor Xiao Ming. Although Buddhist sūtras were regarded as the word of the Buddha which, therefore, represented the ultimate truth, his word was uttered in a different time, in a different country, made for a different audience and was handed down through the vicissitudes of the medium of scriptures. The Daoist version was, on the other hand, a revelation recently made in Southern China by its own gods in a direct encounter with the eye- and ear-witness Yang Xi. This version, therefore, represented the actual truth referring to an actual situation in China proper. As such it was claiming a “higher” truth than, in the Daoists’ view, the Buddhist version.

Another difference between both versions consists in the sequence of the individual sections. The Daoist version starts with section 35, then follow in this order: 42, 40, 41, 36, 37, 38, 39, 4, 5, 7, 9, 10, 11, 17, 14, 20, 21, 23, 25, 31, 33, 22, 8, 6. Omitted are the sections 1–3, 12, 13, 15, 16, 18, 19, 24, 26–30, 32, 34 or seventeen of the original sections. What might have been the reason for their omission?

Let us have a look at the first three of those of the forty-two sections which Yang discarded. In section one, a series of definitions of Buddhist “technical” terms is provided: the śramaṇa is described as a follower of the 250 precepts who eventually will become an arhat or saint. An arhat represents the highest human being (before attaining nirvāṇa) and is described in similar terms than a Daoist immortal or xian 仙 in that he is “able to fly and assume different forms, lives a long life and can move Heaven and Earth”.<sup>50</sup> Next come the stages of a “non-returner” anāgāmin, of a “once-returner” sakṛdāgāmin and of a “stream-winner” śrotaāpanna who still has to be reborn seven times before attaining sainthood. Obviously, these are concepts to which Yang Xi did not have Daoist equivalents at hand nor did he want to invent any. As a consequence, he simply disregarded these sections.

Moreover, Yang systematically excluded all those sections that deal in one way or another with desire, passion or sexuality (i.e., sections 13, 19, 24 [the Buddha’s attempted seduction], 26–30) which, in general, are considered evil according to the Buddhist version. As is well known, for some Daoist traditions sexuality played an important role. The heqi- 和氣 (merging pneumas) ritual, e.g., was an integral part of the Heavenly Masters’ communal life.<sup>51</sup> Although Yang Xi relegated carnal knowledge to a minor status, he himself adhered to a higher form of sexuality, that of the hieros gamos, the union with immortals of the opposite sex in a state of trance.<sup>52</sup> In view of this, it made no sense to him, to keep to the Buddhists’ rejection of sexuality and to retain the relevant passages of the Forty-two sections.

Less dramatic are the differences in those sections which Yang Xi accepted but abbreviated in order to only keep those parts that seemed suitable. So, e.g., the beginning of section nine “feeding one hundred common men is not as good as feeding one good man; feeding one thousand good men is not as good as feeding one who observes the five precepts” is kept, but the following passage “feeding ten thousand men who observe the five precepts is not as good as feeding one stream-winner; feeding one million stream-winners is not as good as feeding one once-returner [...]” is dropped as, again, it deals with specific Buddhist notions (stream-winner, once-returner etc.) that were of no importance to Yang Xi. The second section describing the Buddhist monks, the śramaṇas, whose relevant passage reads: “The Buddha said: ‘Those who shave their heads and faces are śramaṇas. They receive the teaching, abandon worldly wealth and possessions, and beg, seeking only what is necessary. Taking a single meal at midday, and lodging a single night under a tree, they take care not to repeat either. [...]” is accordingly discarded, too. As the Daoists neither shaved their heads nor went around begging for food there was no need to retain this section in the Daoist version of the text.

Also, sections concerning the Buddhist philosophy of the constituents of the body and the “I” or personality are dropped like section eighteen: “The Buddha said: ‘Ardently contemplate the four primary elements that comprise the body. While each has a name, they are all devoid of self. The [sense of an] ‘I’ emerges from the aggregate, but it is not long lived and is really but an illusion.’”

Small wonder, then, that the Buddhist philosophy of impermanence found no place in the Daoist version. Yang Xi did not include section sixteen which reads: “The Buddha said: ‘When gazing at Heaven and Earth contemplate their impermanence. When gazing at mountains and rivers contemplate their impermanence. When gazing at the tremendous variety of shapes and forms of the myriad things in the world contemplate their impermanence. If you keep your mind thus you will attain the Way in no time.’”

Not only did Yang Xi leave out phrases that seemed unfit for his purposes, in a few cases he also added sentences of his own. At the end of section forty-two he appended the sentence “only then [I] say [that you] are able to inquire after the Way!” (始可謂能問道耳). To section thirty-six he added: “[It’s difficult to be born] with [people] who have a good heart of compassion and benevolence. Even if a good heart is manifest, faith in the Way and [its inherent] power and in long life is difficult. Even [having] faith in the Way and [its inherent] power and in long life, to meet with great peace and a revolution of the [cyclical] year renchen is difficult. [So you] may not exert yourself” (有慈仁善心難也。善心既發。信道德長生者難也。既信道德長生。值太平壬辰之運爲難也。可不勗哉). The “revolution of the year renchen” refers to a specific Daoist apocalyptic notion of the fourth and fifth centuries to which we will return shortly. Here Yang Xi is introducing an important aspect of his Daoist cosmology which plays a vital role elsewhere in his writings.

Another important kind of modifications made by Yang Xi was his substituting certain Buddhist names and terms by Daoist ones. One example we have already come accross: in the Daoist version it is no longer the Buddha who speaks but a series of Daoist deities and immortals. Furthermore, whereas the second part of section nine is omitted, the first part is kept in the Daoist version but the original expression 持五戒者 chi wu jie zhe “somebody who observes the five precepts” is substituted by the term 一學道者 yi xue dao zhe “one who studies the Way”, implying a Daoist disciple. Or elsewhere we find, for example, the term 沙門 shamen for śramaṇa replaced by either 一人 yi ren “one person”<sup>53</sup> or by 道士 dao shi “Daoist”.<sup>54</sup>

An interesting example is section ten. Here the Buddha – or in the Daoist version: Lady Purple Prime (紫元夫人 Ziyuan furen) – are defining the “five difficulties” that exist on earth. Whereas both versions agree in the first three of them, namely: “[...] It is difficult for the poor to give alms, it is difficult for the very wealthy to study the Way, it is difficult to control fate and avoid death [...]”, the Buddhist version then has: “[...] it is difficult to attain a glimpse of the Buddha’s sūtras, and it is difficult to be born at the time of a Buddha.” Yang Xi’s version now substitutes 佛經 fo jing “Buddhist sūtras” by 洞經 dong jing “Grotto scriptures”, Daoist texts that is. In addition, the original sentence “it is difficult to be born at the time of a Buddha” is replaced by the phrase “it is difficult to be born at the time of the Latter Sage of the 壬辰 renchen [year].” This now clearly refers to the apocalyptic and messianic ideas of the Daoists of the fourth and fifth centuries. The Latter Sage is, as Strickmann and others have shown, a messianic figure to appear in a renchen year when humankind will have been tormented with catastrophies, inundations, famine, fire and, finally, with facing the end of the world and only those will be saved who believe in the Latter Sage and follow his instructions.<sup>55</sup>

Section thirty-three concerns a Buddhist monk who cherished the idea of returning to secular life. The Buddha seeing it summoned him and discussed the issue. The Buddha is here the still mortal but enlightened being of Hīnayāna Buddhism. In the Daoist version it is the Perfected of Most High (太上真人 Taishang zhenren) who, when apparently a Daoist longed for returning to secular life, changed himself into a mortal being and from Heaven directly came down to that man to discuss the situation with him. The mortal Buddha is substituted by an immortal Daoist god capable of changing his form at will. (One may ask, however, whether this could have been influenced by the Mahāyānist concept of a transcendent Buddha capable of assuming every form suitable to help human beings).

Another interesting modification made by Yang Xi is seen in section thirty-eight which in the Buddhist version reads: “The Buddha said: ‘Should a disciple venture several thousand miles from me yet remain mindful of my precepts, he is certain to attain the Way.” In the Daoist version, this is not only uttered by Taishang zhenren instead of the Buddha, but Yang Xi inserts the following phrases: “and if he investigates the ‘jade scriptures’ and ‘treasure books’, he is certain to become an immortal.” With this additional phrases Yang Xi makes it perfectly clear that the Daoist goal, namely to become an immortal, is entirely different from the Hīnayānist goal, to become an arhat who will get out of samsāra by entering nirvāṇa or final extinction.

54 Sect. 41.

55 STRICKMANN 1979:153–155; BOKENKAMP 1997:295–299.

However, quite a series of sections remain that show almost no or only very minor changes in Yang Xi’s version. Examples are sections 7, 20, 21, 31. Why did Yang Xi preserve them in their original form and did not formulate them anew – especially since he was such a gifted author? He apparently did not only not have the slightest interest to camouflage their provenance, but – quite on the contrary – as the Forty-two sections was already a very well-known text in his own time and as, accordingly, the informed reader would have immediately identified the source, he must have done it deliberately. Why? It was in the Perfected’s interest to correct the texts of other religious traditions, works which had been deformed by “premature” or “imperfect transmission”. By adopting texts from other traditions they could be taken on one’s own board, as it were. A relationship of some sort could thus be established between the other traditions and the own one. However, by having the own gods correcting the other texts the superiority of the own texts over the other versions was made evident – which was just a clever device to show the superiority of the own tradition over the others.

7. Conclusion

In order to transform the Buddhist Forty-two sections of Buddhist sūtras into a Daoist text, Yang Xi first separated the “preface” or narrative part, which explicitly mentions not only the Buddha but also refers to its own title, from the main body of the text. Then, as we have seen, by a series of modifications he removed or substituted all unequivocal Buddhist aspects that had no Daoist correspondence or could not be utilized to his ends. And, finally, he had several Daoist deities and immortals directly reveal the text to himself. It thus was the gods who bestowed upon him their corrected – which means: Daoist – version of the text whose previous transmission by the Buddha was obviously no longer considered adequate by the gods. Note that the same scheme was already applied when the gods revealed to Yang Xi a new and revised version of the Huangting jing 黃庭經 (Scripture of the Yellow Court) whose original version was a text cherished by the older Daoist tradition of the Celestial Masters.<sup>56</sup> In both cases, the original versions, that must have been quite well-known in Yang Xi's time, were neither explicitly criticised nor discarded by him but were simply reduced to a status of lower prestige by the new and "authoritative celestial recensions"<sup>57</sup>.

We may now ask why Yang Xi knew Buddhist texts in the first place. The answer probably lies in the fact that Xu Mi had introduced him to the former King of Guiji, Sima Yu 司馬昱. Sima Yu is recorded in the dynastic histories as an ardent patron of Buddhism and qingtān 清談 who fervently admired Buddhist monks like the famous Zhi Dun 支遁 (314–366). Sima Yu, the future emperor Jianwen (r. 371–373), still as King of Langye employed Yang Xi in his own household. This court must be imagined as a place frequented by lots of Buddhists. If not already before, then Yang Xi must have come into contact with Buddhist scriptures during his service at Sima Yu's court at the latest. It was probably here that he has seen the original Forty-two sections of Buddhist sūtras.

It may be interesting to note in this context that Yang Xi placed some historically high-ranking officials and generals of the early fourth century with wellknown Buddhist sympathies or relations into his shangqing 上清 ([Heaven of] Highest Clarity) pantheon as officials of the Daoist nether world. Examples are the sometime president of the 'board of civil office', Zhou Yi 周顗 (269–322), or the 'generalissimo of the central army', Yin Hao 殷浩 (306–356), or the 'general protecting the army', Feng Huai 馮懷 (fl. 340).<sup>58</sup>

Furthermore – as Isabelle Robinet already had observed – some of the immortals made known by Yang Xi had first been Buddhists themselves or had Buddhists as their disciples.<sup>59</sup> Lord Pei, Perfected Immortal of Qingling, originally came from a Buddhist family and in his early years was educated by a Buddhist monk. Later, when he had become a Daoist, he had Buddhist disciples as had Zhou Yishan, the Perfected of Ziyang. This cannot be by mere chance. Rather, by the time when Yang Xi acted as a private medium and religious specialist on behalf of the Xu family – a family of high-ranking officials –, Buddhism had already taken firm root in at least the upper classes of the southern Chinese society. Yang Xi who, as we have seen, also worked for a ruler with Buddhist interests, had to take this into account. As a Daoist introducing a new denomination that distinguished itself from the Celestial Masters' tradition on the one hand and Buddhism on the other, he could not openly criticise Buddhism. However, by introducing immortals who had started as Buddhists but later turned Daoists he indirectly made clear that his Daoist denomination was superior. It was precisely to this end that he took in the Buddhist text Forty-two sections of Buddhist sūtras and had it revealed by members of his Daoist pantheon in a revised form, which means, had it transformed into a superior Daoist text.

From a Buddhological point of view it is interesting to note that – as our analysis has shown – highly praised early sources such as the Hongming ji must be handled with care as they may not preserve the original versions of the texts they contain. In this respect we also have seen at least one instance of Sengyou's Chu sanzang ji ji containing modified versions of the texts it quotes. Thus, Daoist adaptations of Buddhist scriptures may be used to emend the Buddhist originals.
