Trainee agreements

Professional experience abroad

Economic networks are becoming increasingly global, and national frontiers are losing much of their significance. In these circumstances, many companies consider it important that their staff should have experience abroad. Trainee agreements can contribute to this.

Today, all countries protect their own workers against foreign competition by making employment of foreigners subject to authorisation.

Work and residence permits are normally granted only when a work contract has been signed and when the future employer can show that he has tried unsuccessfully to find a candidate at home for the post in question ("the need to show evidence"). In the last few years, the global economic recession has led to a tightening of such regulations.

21 agreements

But Switzerland takes the view that further training and learning new languages are needed even at a time of high unemployment. So it has concluded reciprocal agreements with 21 countries: Australia, Austria, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Ireland, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Poland, Spain, Sweden, UK, USA. The assiduous counter will see that this comes to only 18 countries; agreements with Italy, Portugal and Russia have been signed but are not yet in force or are not ready for implementation.

The trainee

Trainees in these agreements are persons between 18 and in most cases 30 (21 to 30 for the USA), who have completed a professional training course lasting at least two years or can prove two years practical work in a specific profession. The one chosen is immaterial.

But the applicant must still find a post in his particular profession. He then receives a work and residence permit out of the quota stipulated. This is valid for one year and may be extended for a maximum of six months. In contrast to other types of permit, the labour market authority does not have to consider the job situation in the country concerned, so that "the need to show evidence" does not apply.

Trainees must be paid wages according to the work they perform. These must be sufficient to cover living costs. The expression "customary local rates for the profession" is often used: a foreign worker should never be paid less than his local colleagues.

How to apply

A person wishing to take up residence abroad as a trainee should first look for a job himself. But in today's context of high unemployment, this has become very difficult. The labour authority of the partner country cannot take an active part in finding a post but can provide tips on how to go about it and can assist the efforts of prospective trainees by "supporting measures". It is important always to mention the trainee agreement with the country in question, since this does help in finding a post, at least indirectly.

Does this apply to Swiss Abroad?

The agreements apply to all citizens of contracting states. This means that Swiss Abroad may also obtain trainee permits for work and residence in third countries. Just as for candidates resident in Switzerland, applications by Swiss Abroad must be channelled through the Federal Office for Industry and

The handbook "Advisor to the Swiss Abroad" also discusses these trainee agreements in some detail. See order form on page 10.

Solidarity Fund for the Swiss Abroad

Security across frontiers

What happens if Swiss Abroad suddenly lose their livelihood and find themselves without resources? It is no easy matter to build up a new existence abroad, and even in Switzerland the present situation is by no means rosy. So the financial help to start again which is guaranteed to members of the Fund is more than welcome.

Building destroyed by mortar fire in Sarajevo: many Swiss Abroad living in ex-Yugoslavia have lost their means of livelihood; very few were insured!

To think in good time about what could happen and to behave as if it already had – that was the guiding idea when the Solidarity Fund for the Swiss Abroad was set up in 1958. Its aim is to ensure our compatriots against loss of livelihood all over the world.

Concrete help

Deep down, Swiss Abroad are always aware of the danger that they could lose their livelihood from one day to the next as a result of political or warlike events. To provide a solid foundation for such cases, the Fund offers insurance which may extend to Sfr. 100,000 per person. This means that a family of four persons could be covered by a respectable safety net amounting to Sfr. 400,000. From its foundation until the end of 1993, the Fund has helped 560 Swiss Abroad in financial difficulty by paying compensation amounting to Sfr. 8,268 million. In a further 62 cases, benefits of about half a million francs have been paid from a special assistance fund. Most affected were Swiss living in Algeria, Egypt, Morocco, Zaire and Tunisia. At present, the worst European countries are former East Germany and ex-Yugoslavia.

Attractive arrangements

Within the last year, 450 Swiss Abroad have discovered the incomparable advantages of livelihood insurance through the Fund and have become members. Why the unbroken attraction of a self-help scheme which has now become traditional? Dramatic events worldwide lead Swiss Abroad to examine their own positions more critically. So many countries today are subject to unrest, revolt, revolution, war and currency crisis, not to speak of enmity against foreigners. And the economic situation at home is still marked by persistent recession, with more than 180,000 unemployed, so that the chances of Swiss Abroad building up a new livelihood in Switzerland are not exactly ideal.

Dangerous times

The Gulf war and the bloody events in ex-Yugoslavia have brought many Swiss Abroad up against the problem of insufficient livelihood insurance. Present times show that the risk of losing everything is never completely absent. The insurance system created by the Fund is unique. The possibility of choosing between three risk categories enables members to work out their own individualised insurance. The scheme makes it possible to combine livelihood insurance with a profitable savings account, and the Fund also enables its members to join the Swiss health insurance system on favourable terms should this become desirable.
