Why no canton for the Swiss Abroad? (SR 1/96)

Giving Swiss Abroad the right to vote in elections and referendums is not aimed at strengthening already existing structures and political lobbies within Switzerland. On the contrary, we would like to build up our own political structure in which our full cultural and political potential is able to blossom – so that in this way we can make a valuable contribution to Switzerland. Such a structure can be achieved only by creating a canton for the Swiss Abroad. Like the other cantons this should have two councillors of state and national councillors commensurate with the number of voters. Only in this way would the Swiss Abroad be able to bring their ideas, connections, influence and standards to Swiss politics. The present voting procedure through one's municipality of origin or where one has once lived – with which we Swiss Abroad often have little contact – may be understandable as an administrative stopgap, but it should not be maintained for long and should be improved.

Walter R. Hunziker, France

I think that in elections and referendums the votes of Swiss Abroad should be counted separately and not integrated into the results of the constituency chosen by the voter. Any Swiss citizen living inside the country has the privilege of knowing the results for his canton, his district, his municipality and, in large towns, even his own neighbourhood. So it would be only fair if Swiss Abroad were given information about the number of those voting and the results.

André Panchaud, France

Swearing in the Federal Council

In Swiss Review 1/96 we showed a picture of all the federal councillors being confirmed in their posts. Many readers have asked us why Ruth Dreifuss alone amongst them did not have her hand raised. The explanation is simple. The swearing in can take the form either of an oath or a promise. If you swear, you raise your hand and say "I swear". If you promise, you say "I promise" without raising your hand. Federal councillors may choose between the two forms.

Changes in customer services

Swiss Radio International places great value on contact with its listeners. The desire to remain close to the public is all the stronger because so many SRI listeners live thousands of kilometres away. To build ties and maintain them reliably, SRI keeps in touch through letters, an extensive subscription service for its programme guides and regular listener surveys.

However, methods of communication are changing quickly and profoundly everywhere, as technology changes. These changes are affecting SRI's customer services department and prompting it to adjust.

SRI listeners, anywhere and at any time, will be able to keep up to date easily and reliably on news concerning programmes and reception conditions. Listeners who feel the need to criticise programmes or suggest changes will have direct access for their comments. For its part, SRI will be able to carry out listener surveys efficiently and on schedule for planning programmes, broadcast times and frequencies.

For SRI to achieve its goals in customer services, certain prerequisites have to be met by both SRI and its listeners. Hence, the following questions. We thank in advance all those who take part in this enquiry and kindly request that you send the enclosed questionnaire with your answers to:

Swiss Radio International Communication & Marketing Services, P.O. Box CH-3000 Berne 15.
