Even before the war, the traffic over the Gotthard line had necessitated block sections in the 10-mile length of the double-track Gotthard Tunnel. Since fully-automatic signalling was considered too expensive at the time, the solution adopted in 1938 was to have a mid-tunnel block post controlled remotely from the signal box at Göschenen, at the northern end of the tunnel. The tunnel signals were connected with Göschenen by a 50-line cable.

Further expansion of traffic during and after the war has made it increasingly difficult to maintain the tracks and over-head wires during intervals between trains, so that frequent night possessions and single-line working have been required. In order to avoid single-line working over the whole section, crossovers were installed in mid-tunnel.

The mid-tunnel signalling, though still controlled remotely from Göschenen, now provides home and starting signals for both directions. The starters are over half a mile from the crossovers, so that between crossover and signal there is standing room for a complete train enabling a train to vacate a single-line section without having to wait until the preceding train has cleared the tunnel. The starting signals return automatically to "off" when the tunnel section ahead has been cleared. Home signals are controlled by a king lever, at Göschenen, which permits automatic operation during normal double-line working.

Single-line working in the southern half of the tunnel depends on the consent of the signalman at Airolo, by means of electric interlocking with Göschenen. Provision has been made, also, for emergency operation of the mid-tunnel points and signals from a small signal box on the spot.
