T I M E

IT IS constantly reiterated that Time is the most important ingredient in the daily life of mankind. It is the most cherished element for which man craves; time to live, to work, to play; time, always time. If then, time is most precious, should we not be more careful in the use of it?

Time lost is never regained in its fullness, yet, how prodigal we are inclined to be in the use of it. To use it to good purpose and apply it with diligence to our daily tasks, be they large or small, will bequeath to us gems of great price which await our inheritance.

“Time”, it is said, was made for slaves, but if this were true then all men would be slaves, for what man, worthy of the name, does not value his time above all things?

After all, time is what we make it — valuable or otherwise. Though it fleets by with unswerving fidelity to its task of measuring life, we can do with it what we will — while it is here.
