Ovid Met. 6.9: Idmon's Dye

By Howard Jacobson, Urbana

Ovid begins his narrative of the tale of Arachne with some information about her family background. Inter alia we are told that her father, Idmon of Colophon, would dye wool with the purple dye of the murex (Phocaico bibulas tingebat murice lanas: 6.9). Commentators note the occasional piece of evidence for the use of dying in Lydia (e.g. Pliny NH 7.196), though nothing explicitly referring to Colophon (or Phocaea, for that matter). So I note here an interesting text that explicitly associates Colophon with purple dye.

In a fragment of the sixth century elegiac poet Xenophanes of Colophon, he reports (presumably based on autopsy) that in Colophon 1000 men would meet in assembly dressed in all-purple garb¹. Scholars debate whether the clothing reflected merely the wealth of the 1000 or was a sign of their authority. Be this as it may, the text makes it clear that there was an ample market for the product of a purple-dyer in Colophon².
