

Zeitschrift: Schweizerische Zeitschrift für Soziologie = Revue suisse de sociologie
= Swiss journal of sociology

Herausgeber: Schweizerische Gesellschaft für Soziologie

Band: 22 (1996)

Heft: 1

Artikel: Sociological theory in the tension between globalisation and localisation
: the Münch-Alexander debate

Autor: Turner, Bryan S.

DOI: <https://doi.org/10.5169/seals-814687>

Nutzungsbedingungen

Die ETH-Bibliothek ist die Anbieterin der digitalisierten Zeitschriften. Sie besitzt keine Urheberrechte an den Zeitschriften und ist nicht verantwortlich für deren Inhalte. Die Rechte liegen in der Regel bei den Herausgebern beziehungsweise den externen Rechteinhabern. Siehe Rechtliche Hinweise.

Conditions d'utilisation

L'ETH Library est le fournisseur des revues numérisées. Elle ne détient aucun droit d'auteur sur les revues et n'est pas responsable de leur contenu. En règle générale, les droits sont détenus par les éditeurs ou les détenteurs de droits externes. Voir Informations légales.

Terms of use

The ETH Library is the provider of the digitised journals. It does not own any copyrights to the journals and is not responsible for their content. The rights usually lie with the publishers or the external rights holders. See Legal notice.

Download PDF: 17.05.2025

ETH-Bibliothek Zürich, E-Periodica, <https://www.e-periodica.ch>

SOCIOLOGICAL THEORY IN THE TENSION BETWEEN GLOBALISATION AND LOCALISATION:
THE MÜNCH – ALEXANDER DEBATE

Bryan S. Turner
Faculty of Arts
Deakin University

Since its inception in Europe in the first half of the nineteenth century, the discipline of sociology has been, often implicitly, situated in a theoretical and political tension between a science of the institutions of particular nation states and a science of global or universal social processes. This tension should not be surprising to sociologists, given our commitment to a sociology of knowledge program which in its strong version suggests that ideas, both scientific and popular, are the products of underlying social processes. In its weak version this argument suggests that scientific beliefs are at least related or relevant to social circumstances (Turner, 1995). Sociology has been both a science with a focus on the specific political and cultural context of the processes of industrialisation and modernisation within given nation states and a science of industrial society in general with an intellectual focus on processes of modernisation and universal industrialisation. In short, sociology reflected from its origins a dualistic focus on local and global processes.

It would be unusual if sociological beliefs were not subject to social processes and therefore in practice sociology typically developed as a set of explanations and understandings of local or national issues and concerns. For example we can identify these “two faces of sociology” (Turner, 1990) in the work of writers like Claude-Henri de Saint-Simon who both argued for the importance of a general belief system (Nouveau Christianisme) and reflected the specific political conditions of revolutionary France. While sociology was subject to the general influence of the French Revolution and the industrial revolution (Nisbet, 1967), it evolved in terms of national traditions, giving rise to a variety of sociological approaches (Levine, 1995). For example, while Max Weber’s famous general theory of power (in the distinction between class, status and party) was an attempt to provide a general framework for sociological theory, his substantive sociological questions were a direct response to the peculiar configuration of social classes in late nineteenth-century Germany, where he attempted to develop a specific understanding of the peculiarities of the Junkers, the politically marginal middle class and the reformist working class. In similar fashion Herbert Spencer’s reflection on the relationship between the individual and society was a direct product of the problems of individualism in English liberalism.

Although sociology as a perspective on modernisation processes had its origins in European societies, specifically in France and Germany, it is well known that the professionalisation of sociology as a university discipline depended significantly on institutional developments in North America, particularly in the University of Chicago. While in Europe the development of sociology as a perspective on industrial societies had been influenced significantly by the nature of social class struggle, the development of American sociology was more influenced by the problems of an ethnically diverse urban environment, by questions therefore of migration, and by a social pragmatism which was committed to the reform of a racist society (Smith, 1988). From those somewhat different starting points, European and North American sociology have been separated not only by different perspectives on substantive political and social issues but also by significantly different theoretical styles. North American sociology has been generally characterised by a concern for large scale empirical surveys using survey data analysis, and European sociology has been more concerned with philosophical, conceptual and theoretical issues. Although this simplistic contrast between empiricism and theoretical sociology should not be exaggerated, it nevertheless indicates an important difference between North American and European traditions. These tensions and ambiguities were clearly illustrated by the role of German intellectuals as migrant intellectuals in North America during the Nazi period. The debates about facism and mass society served to emphasise the ambiguity of radical European theorists in relation to American empiricism in a context of democratic struggles against fascist authoritarianism (Lowenthal, 1987: 201–215).

Against the background of these trans-Atlantic conflicts, American sociology came to dominate world sociology through its professionalisation, the development of applied social research, and university support for sociology departments. Within this context, the sociological theories of Talcott Parsons came to play a crucial role as a mediation between the classical sociology of Weber, Durkheim and Simmel, and American social reformism. Parsonian sociology, while a dominant element in American professional sociology, was nevertheless internally criticised by conflict theory, by symbolic interactionism, ethnomethodology and exchange theory (Alexander, 1987). The intellectual conflict between European and North American sociology has in recent years often hinged around conflicting interpretations of both Weber and Parsons. Within this framework one can see the rise of neo-functionalism (Alexander, 1985) as an attempt to reassert the vitality of North American sociology through new interpretations of structural functionalism against its European critics (Robertson and Turner, 1991). In this struggle over the legacies of Weber and Parsons the question of sociology's relationship to fascism has been a major if submerged issue. Recent interpretations of Parsons have underlined his involvement in progressive democratic politics and have rejected the idea of Parsons as merely a Cold War warrior, a spokesperson for capitalist hegemony (Gerhardt, 1993). By contrast, the view of Weber as a defender of nationalist and authoritarian politics remains entrenched, given for example Weber's views on migrant labour east of the Elb, his views on the Russian Revolution and his commitment to a strong German state (Weber, 1995).

This historic struggle between American and European sociology for intellectual leadership developed into a new stage with the collapse of organised Communism in Eastern Europe, the fall of the Berlin Wall and the first stages of German reunification. Richard Münch's critical views on American sociology can be seen as a call to a renewal of the leadership of German sociology in world sociology, and as a reflection of the growing political and economic significance of Germany not only within Europe but within the global economy. There is no need here to repeat the debate which has taken place between Richard Münch, Jeffrey Alexander and Donald Levine in the pages of Theory, The Newsletter of the Research Committee on Social Theory of the International Sociological Association (reprinted in the Swiss Journal of Sociology, 3, 1995). Münch's views on "Anglo-American cultural imperialism" (Münch, 1993: 61) are only too well known and understood. These views to some extent reinforced and repeated earlier arguments (Münch, 1991).

Some aspects of Münch's position are expressed elsewhere in contemporary German sociology, specifically with respect to the interpretation of Weber's sociology. Post-war debates between American and European scholars over the legacy of Weber can be dated from the historic encounter in Heidelberg in 1964 to celebrate the hundredth year of Weber's birth. For Mommsen (1989: 185) this event "signified a revitalised interest in the Federal Republic in Max Weber's work and a willingness to take-up the running where American scholarship had left off." Once more, Talcott Parsons became an object of criticism because of his allegedly false interpretations of Weber, specifically over the question of the translation of the word Herrschaft, which Parsons naively rendered as "leadership". In recent years this critique of Parsons has been re-established by Wilhelm Hennis who is quite explicit in his exegetical reappropriation of the German quality of Weber's sociology. He argues "Weber was a German thinker, from the land of 'Doctor Faustus'" (Hennis, 1988: 195); the novels of Thomas Mann are regarded as the best literary approach to the intellectual environment of Weber. Second, the misunderstanding of the Weber thesis regarding Protestantism and capitalism, which is so common apparently amongst the followers of Parsons, “no longer happens among German scholars” (Hennis, 1988: 26) with the single exception of Jürgen Habermas, who turns Weber’s primary interest in the theory of communicative action “on its head” (Hennis, 1998: 201). In these intellectual developments we see not only an attempt to reassert the intellectual leadership of German sociologists but to claim that the exegesis of German sociology has to be left to German speakers. This interpretation is fully in line with Münch’s view about language and so-called American imperialism.

These nationalistic struggles over intellectual leadership in the world of sociology have a number of negative consequences. First there is a tendency to exaggerate the homogeneity of national sociology traditions and their dominant intellectual interests. For example within both North America and Germany one can find an extreme variation in types of sociology and therefore there is always an exaggeration in the notion of “American sociology” or “German sociology”. In short, nationalist struggles suppress the inherent heterogeneity of forms of sociological thinking within a nation state context. Secondly, these nationalist confrontations will further fragment sociology both as a discipline and as a professional grouping, leading to further difficulties in securing theoretical cumulation in sociological theory (Turner, 1989). Thirdly, it exposes sociological theory to the problem of reductio ad absurdum. If the concept of German sociology is viable, why not Westphalian sociology or Bavarian sociology. Fourthly, it suppresses the obvious necessity for not only comparative sociology but for genuine international collaboration over common global problems and issues. For example, while research on Aboriginal society and culture is a topic of particular concern to Australian anthropologists and sociologists, the issues of aboriginality, otherness and native rights are issues of global concern in contemporary politics. Finally, we could see these conflicts between national and universal aspects of sociology as an inevitable outcome of the dialectic between the local and the global which has been observed by a variety of contemporary sociologists (Featherstone, Lash and Robertson, 1995). These criticisms indicate that the current “nationalist” turn in European sociology will have distinctively negative consequences for the coherence and continuity of the discipline. In a context of increasing globalization, a nationalist or parochial orientation is literally reactionary as a platform for the development of sociology.

REFERENCES

- Alexander, J. C. (1985), Neo-Functionalism, Beverly Hills: Sage.
- Alexander, J. C. (1987), Twenty Lectures, Sociological Theory Since World War II, New York: Columbia University Press.
- Featherstone, M.; S. Lash and R. Robertson, eds. (1995), Global Modernities, London: Sage.
- Gerhardt, U., ed. (1993), Talcott Parsons on National Socialism, New York: Aldine De Gruyter.
- Hennis, W. (1988), Max Weber, Essays in Reconstruction, London: Allen & Unwin.
- Levine, D. N. (1995), Visions of the Sociological Tradition, Chicago and London: The University of Chicago Press.
- Lowenthal, L. (1987), An Unmastered Past: The Autobiographical Reflections of Leo Lowenthal, Berkeley: University of California Press.
- Mommsen, W. J. (1989), The Political and Social Theory of Max Weber, Cambridge: Polity Press.
- Münch, R. (1991), American and European Social Theory: Cultural Identities and Social Forms of Theory Production, Sociological Perspectives, 34, 313–35.
- Münch, R. (1993), The Contribution of German Social Theory to European Sociology, in: B. Nedelmann and P. Sztompka, eds., Sociology in Europe, In Search of Identity, Berlin: Walter De Gruyter.
- Nisbet, R. A. (1967), The Sociological Tradition, London: Heinemann.
- Robertson, R. and B. S. Turner, eds. (1991), Talcott Parsons, Theorist of Modernity, London: Sage.
- Smith, D. (1988), The Chicago School, A Liberal Critique of Capitalism, London: Macmillan.
- Turner, B. S. (1989), Some Reflections on Cumulative Theorizing in Sociology, in: J. H. Turner, ed., Theory Building in Sociology, Assessing Theoretical Cumulation, New Bury Park: Sage, 131–147.
- Turner, B. S. (1990), Two Faces of Sociology: Global or National?, Theory Culture and Society, 7, 343–358.
- Turner, B. S. (1995), Karl Mannheim's Ideology and Utopia, Political Studies, 43, 718–727.
- Weber, M. (1995), The Russian Revolutions, Cambridge: Polity Press.

Author's address:

Professor Bryan S. Turner,
Faculty of Arts, Deakin University,
Geelong Victoria 3217, Australia

Since 1963, SOCIETY has been at the center of debate on the major social and political issues of our day. Operating out of the deep conviction that real-world problems matter, SOCIETY responds to the changing needs and concerns of a sophisticated readership that demands fearless, penetrating analysis of the social attitudes and political beliefs underlying the headlines.

Six times a year, SOCIETY brings you clear thinking and perceptive analysis, presented in readable articles and special features by leading social scientists. It is the publication of choice for those who want to look beyond their personal and professional worlds into a larger arena where key thinkers address fundamental issues that concern us all.

Recent special sections include:

Professional Ethics
Race Norming
Children and Their Caretakers
Risk, Safety and Capitalism
Marijuana Policy and Drug Mythology
America First Revisited
Medicine
Safety Nets and Welfare Ceilings
Private Business and Public Interests
Sexual Harassment

Irving Louis Horowitz
EDITOR-IN-CHIEF
Rutgers University

Society

Published Bimonthly

Subscription rates:

Individuals: $48/yr; $90/2yrs; $126/3yrs
Institutions: $108/yr; $204/2yrs; $288/3yrs
Domestic first-class add $30/yr
Foreign surface mail add $32/yr
Foreign airmail add $60/yr
(Rates subject to change annually)

TRANSACTION PUBLISHERS
DEPARTMENT 2095
RUTGERS—THE STATE UNIVERSITY
NEW BRUNSWICK, NEW JERSEY 08903

Call 908/445-2280 or Fax 908/445-3138