zing again, at the wine, wine, wine "). Two popular singers, with doubtful voices but an ap-parently unshakable conviction of their musical talent, would wander from table to table and sing, accompanied by the Schrammel orchestra, the tunes which the father of the family or the young woman's young man might ask for.

After the war there came a sudden change. The English spirit suddenly invaded the Con-tinent, and the English week-end penetrated, via Germany, to Vienna. In recent years the old-style Vienna excursions have been losing their attraction; the Viennese are now going on week-ends. No country is more bountifully equipped for the week-end excursions than Austria, with her magnificent Alps, and the Southern and Western termini in Vienna are packed out with an apparently unmanageable crowd every Satur-day morning and noon. Mountaineering was al-ways a favourite sport of the Austrians, but it has become infinitely more popular during the last five years. The Social Democrats of Vienna have intentionally trained their members to become good mountaineers. The party leaders considered that excursions in the Alps and a day in the open-air were both healthier and more dignified than spending the Sanday in wayside inns or in After the war there came a sudden change. open-air were both healthier and more dignined than spending the Sunday in wayside inns or in a Heurige, drinking wine all day long and far into the night. Tens of thousands of young Socialists have joined the Association of the "Natur-freunde" (Friends of Nature), and the leaders have arranged all sorts of facilities enabling the workers, grown-ups and young people, to spend the week-end in the glorious Austrian mountains of the lacet proscible cost at the least possible cost.

It is a common sight in Vienna on Saturdays to see a score of young people marching two by two towards one of the railway stations. The men wear khaki shirts, short leather trousers, and heavy nailed boots; the women are dressed in pleasant printed calico dresses, the so-called "Dirndl."

One of the most popular week-end excursions of the Viennese in summer is to one or other of the many beach bathing-places along the Danube. There are fine swimming possibilities, especially near Klosterneuburg and Kritzendorf, and at these places huge colonies, with small week-end houses, have sprung into existence during recent years years.

houses, have sprung into existence during recent years. Austria, like Switzerland, is in the happy position that her inhabitants can undertake week-end trips both summer and winter. In win-ter the many and excellent ski-ing slopes of the mountains are visited. A Saturday morning at a Vienna station conveys the impression of a huge military camp, men and women alike wearing the blue "Norwegians," the skiers' uniform : wide blue trousers fastened round the heavy boots, blue coats with high collars, and the typical Norwegian cap, and every one of them "armed " with their pair of skis, like lances. The new Austrian rail-way coaches provide special room on the top for the skis. There are plenty of excellent ski-ing places near Vienna. The Semmering district, the Styrian mountains, the Wechsel district can all be reached in one to three hours' time, and in the higher parts of Styria the snow lasts till the middle of April. Passionate skiers who are able to take a longer week-end, often travel to Tyrol or to the Rax, which can be reached by train and by the cableway in two hours from Vienna. Satur-day night is spent in the many very good if some-what primitive hotels of the valleys. What has become of the Heurige? They still fourish but they are no longer frequented by the Many foreigners, including a huge number of English and American tourists, now visit Vienna, and the Heurige has adopted itself to their requirements. The tables are now covered with white cloths, the oil lamps have given place to electric light. The customers of the Heurige no longer bring their food with them, but eat à la carte. The wine is no longer served in carafes, but sold in bottles, and less cheaply. The only thing which has not changed is the music and the two popular singers. They sing to rich Americans from the Middle West "Wien, Wien, nur du allein . . ."
