Somehow this people has preserved an intel-lectual and social flavor all its own. Genevese speak French and are surrounded by France with-in a few miles on all sides except the lake front, yet have not lost their individuality. A handful of people — the entire canton numbers only some 173,000, most of them in the city — have clung to their hill through centuries of struggle for political, religious and cultural independence.

Solidarity among such a people is natural, but Geneva's traditions go beyond solidarity. They include sturdy self-reliance and an open door into which refugees have poured from many lands.

Genuine Genevese — the type is clearly marked — combine conservative and progressive ideas in a rare way. Their faces are cast in strong lines. Like many peoples of stern fiber and in-trospection, they are sometimes dubbed "cold, unsympathetic," by those who fail to see beneath the surface. the surface.

More than casual acquaintance is required More than casual acquantance is required to understand the Genevese. Their existence is hardly sensed by many who come to see interna-tional organizations in action. Geneva in full blast of an arms conference or League Assembly obscures the Geneva of narrow, steep streets on the old hill at night, with fountains always "ker-chunking" into their basins, cathedral bells sounding the hour, and an occasional troupe of singing students on their way home from a soirée. Summer visitors to the Wall of the Reforma-

Summer visitors to the Wall of the Reforma-tion come close to something fundamental in the original Geneva. After most tourists have gone, Geneva itself comes out of a Sunday morning in November to celebrate the Fête of the Reformation tion. That night, Protestants without regard to de-nomination gather in the cathedral. Zwinglians, Lutherans, Calvinists — many sects from many nations — put aside differences of creed in a com-mon service. The Reformation lives again. Cal-un's strict, even harsh, rule of the first Protestant religious state seems less hard to understand. It is remembered that he underwent extreme provo-cation before resorting to extreme measures. Libertines insulted him in public, plotted for more than a decade to ruin plans he regarded as God-given, and finally raised an armed insurrection against his authority. His stern repression comes into perspective in a cathedral that changed hands during a major battle of the Reformation. Geneva's hill — still the city's geographical during a major battle of the Reformation. Geneva's hill — still the city's geographical centre — wears its age easily. Streets and build-ings have been kept in repair. They' are clean. Unlike ancient quarters in many cities, this one has no incrustations of soot. Crumbling stones are less frequent than might be expected. Walls are uniformly mellowed. Buildings bear sixteenth century dates as if that were yesterday. Streets twist, rise — break into flights of steps. Eaves project at rakish angles over courtyards. Cob-blers bend over their work in half-basements. Their lamps light interiors that hint rude arched passageways leading back into the hill. Barred doors shut off steep flights of steps. Other evi-dences remain of days when the whole hill was a walled defense. walled defense.

Everywhere, fountains splash. Many are white marble, with chiseled designs that have taken on the wear of use. For these fountains represent kitchen faucets to many residents of the old hill. A boy dips his pail between flowers that grow at the centre of a large fountain. It is at the terraced junction of two streets. With drip-ping pail, the boy disappears into an arched cor-ridor ridor ridor. At a plainer trough,(attached to another fountain, a woman with red hands sloshes linen white. No central heating softens the cold of these public watering places. Nor can anything in the way of public fountains exceed the clarity and color of this water, fresh from the lake, and only shortly from the Alps. Within the depth of an ordinary fountain, its liquid prisms break into pale blues and turquoise. In winter, ice forms fantastic patterns around the spouts.

fantastic patterns around the sponts. Modern Geneva has expanded from the hill, but has in no sense deserted it. Every building is in use. Cantonal and city government is still centrered there in the picturesque "Hotel de la Ville" and annexes. The cathedral is surrounded by headquarters of religious societies. Stores, homes and workshops fill the old city's queer cor-rens. The ancient atmosphere is disturbed only in rare cases. One shop recently superimposed a modernistic front on a medieval interior. The more usual practice is to mark such a word as "garage" on a doorway that could not possibly accommodate a medium-sized car. Within the narrow limits of the old hill.

Within the narrow limits of the old hill, Within the narrow limits of the old hill, Geneva of history more than holds its own against waves of post-war architecture. Off the hill, modernism — even futurism — makes sweeping incursions. Apartment buildings — many of extreme design — multiply. These belong to the new Geneva. Journalists and others attracted to the city by international activities occupy them. If these modern buildings draw sufficient residents from houses of the older city, those may be demolished. This process has begun in some sec-tions of the city, but the hill could only be remade by tearing it down. Fortunately for Geneva's picturesqueness, that is not a probability. Geneva of the Genevese and Geneva of inter-nationalism have many links, despite their differ-ences. The city has given several officials to the League and International Labor Office, A lively interest is taken locally in doings of these organi-zations. Their coming has given new impetus to the teaching of international subjects in the uni-versity. This means much, because Geneva sets store by the institution which has grown from Calvin's Academy. With characteristic independence, however,

Calvin's Academy. With characteristic independence, however, Genevese never lose sight of something generally overlooked by the world — that Geneva enjoyed a satisfying culture centuries before the city be came a seat of organized internationalism. That culture goes on, a stabilizing influence for both Genevas during ups and downs of international hopes, fears, disappointments — and gains. R. H. S. Christ. Sc. Mon.

E PAAR ALBUMSPRUECH. von Alfred Huggenberger.

s hät mänge Freud am Tadle, 's hat mange Freud am Tadle, Stoht's Hüüsli fertig do; Und hett er selber's Plänli g'macht, Wär's tümmer usecho. So isch es bim Regiere, 's verrysst au mänge's Mul. Und wenn de säb a's Rueder chunt, So goht d'Sach erst recht ful.

Vom alte Wy hät mänge scho Viell neu Gedanke-n-übercho; En andre hät's mit allne Liste Nid witer 'procht, als zu-n-ere Chiste.

So lang's no Mich und Anke git Und Chäs und Ziger, vill dass d'witt Cha d'Schwitz sich durebringe. 's hät mänge füf, sechs Bierli truckt, d'Chind händ diheim 's leer Kafi gschluckt, d'Milch sei jo nid z'erschwinge. Me meint, 's ist all' de glichig Märt, Was nid vill chost, sei nid vill wert.

HERE AND THERE IN THE ALPS.

Paschalis II founded the bishopric of Bethlehem in Palestine in 1109 A.D. However, in 1223 the Mohamedans returned to power and the Bishop of Bethlehem fled to Clamécy in France where he was enabled to establish a temporary ecclesiastical residence in the suburb of Panténor. Since Roman Catholic Church law does not accept the dis solution of a diocese by a worldly power, the bishopric of Bethlehem, in an honorary capacity, never ceased to exist. Panténor became each honorary bishop's seat up to the days of the French Revolution.

At that time Bishop Durant de Lironcourt was requested to abdicate. Upon his refusal to do so, the little diocese of Panténor was dissolved do so, the fittle diocese of Fantenor was dissorted and the bishop barely escaped with his life. After his death the honorary bishopric of Bethlehem remained an unoccupied office until 1840, when Pope Gregory XVI ordered in his own handwriting that the abbot of the Monastery of St. Maurice should henceforth assume the honorary office of Bishop of Bethlehem, and the abbot of St. Maurice is generally a Swiss.

St. Maurice is a town of very ancient origin. St. Maurice is a town of very ancient origin. Excavations carried on here are continually un-earthing old tombstones, inscriptions and archaeological fragments of all kinds. St. Maurice was at first the small fortified market-town of the Nantuates, a celtic people, which in-habited the lower Valais. Later it became a Roman fortification under the name of Agaunum.

In 302 A.D. St. Maurice, commander of the Theban legion, suffered martyrdom here with his companions, and pious pilgrims erected soon aftercompanions, and pious pilgrims erected soon after-wards a small monastery on the spot where these men had given up their lives for the principles of Christianity. This modest house of prayer was inaugurated by Bishop Theodore I of Octodurum, the present Martigny, between 381 and 390. One hundred years later King Sigismund of Burgundy journeyed to 8t. Maurice to do penance, and upon his departure he presented the foundation with such a handsome gift that it was able to build a large new church. Some 500 monks then became stationed at St. Maurice as the place now was stationed at St. Maurice, as the place now was called.

The present church of this Augustinian Abbey was erected in 1611-27, but excavations made in the interior of this large ecclesiastical settlement have exposed to view the remains of foundations and catacombs of various epochs. Priceless manu-scripts and works of art are contained in the library and treasury.

On their way from their dwellings to the Abbey church the brethren have to walk daily over the last resting place of the Theban legion, and the famous bells of St. Maurice send their stirring messages from a Romanesque tower, which dates back to the days of Charle-magne, mighty protector of the church.
