POETRY.

By K. E. Dick.

"MORNING SCENE."

A white yawn has spread itself across the sky
And eyes that have held dreams are dulled
By grinning shades of grey as morning's ghost-like hours

Haunt way the last silver thread of dreams.

In the tube bodies press against bodies
(Oh Atthis could you but see how grotesque
The human body is in this oozing-to-gether!)
And sway to and fro and stare through each other.

— This contact has frightened sympathy away —
A rhythmless beat sounds throughout the city
As these people hurry mechanically
Along a way they never see.

Only a child's eyes smiling to meet mine
Remind me that a dawn of brilliant gold
Has brought about this morning scene,

"PEOPLE OF THE EARTH."

They are the people of the fruitful earth;
They plough and sow, work hard to show their worth:

Their little bit of land, they work for it.
They have no power, intellect nor wit.
Nature they do not question or discuss;
Contented, peaceful, tranquil, living thus
A life of continual harmony

Enjoying to the full the words: 'to be'
With restful eyes they watch their children grow,
And teach them all the knowledge that they know.

Pray and believe in their own simple God,
Trying to follow on the way He trod,
That future years may bring prosperity
Wherein dwells the wealth of Eternity.

"FOSSIL"

Long ago,
Long before
Man had deflowered
The virgin forest
And mated her to the town,
Long ago
I loved you much and lost you
To life's carelessness
With its bitter stumbling years.
Now again
I pass near you in the street
Your eyes look to mine:
Do I expect remembrance?
It was
So long ago
Since we loved,
Even the forest has forgotten.
