"Government of the People." The old masse leaves " the People " undefined. It says protein gabout their belong in to a particular territory, nothing even about their historic identity. We infer that those things, though obviously important, are yet not essential thing is just that those subjected to a particular Government are in fact one people, able to live in loyal fellow-citizenship truth contained, along with much that is a squee and puzzling, in the doctrine of Rousseau that it is the existence of a "General Will " which makes a " Sovereign People." But a sense of unity so firmly rooted that men can a swe say, " agree to differ " without the unity of the People being impaired, then it follows that sense of unity so firmly rooted that men can a swe say. " agree to differ " without the unity of the People being impaired, then it follows that people, yet be being impaired, then it follows that people, if the harmony and the sense of unity as the doctrine of noissense that eagle unions should not be dissolved by the fancy of the parties." But, as with the union of husting the foregotive that devices and wife in marriage, so also in regard to recognise that legal unions should not be dissolved by the fancy of the parties." But, as with the union of the spin the dissoluble. The principles of Demoritory fue fore foremans from Czechoslovakia, for field states, necessarily opposed to the severance of the Sudeten Germans from Czechoslovakia, by Sudeten Germans from Czechoslovakia, by Sudeten Germans from Czechoslovakia, by Sudeten Germans rested not on the racial diverse in the world of a People whose other states between them and the Czechs, but on the spin set state between them and the Czechs, but on the spin set search the world of a People whose other set search be indiver and the czechs, but on the spin set search be indiver and the czechs, but on the spin set search be indiver and the czechs, but on the spin set search be the set search be a diver search be the set search be a diver search be differences of race and language and religion.

It is only on the grounds of fundamental principles that we can really explain the attitude be claiming a monopoly in humane feelings and common sense for those who believe in Demo-Democracy is the cause of Peace we may seem to be claiming a monopoly in humane feelings and common sense for those who believe in Demo-cracy. But though the love of Peace is strong in the hearts of many whose social and political out-look is far from being democratic, and though in the ardour of youth or impatient old age some sincere believers in the democratic ideal may at times appear strangely belicose, Democracy is none the less more essentially pacific than other political creeds. Based on a belief in reason, reaching its decisions by free discussion, settling differences at the ballot box, and treating minori-ties with consideration, so that men may in the deepest sense of the words "agree to differ." Democracy necessarily implies the use of peaceful methods in domestic politics. Naturally it works in the same way in international affairs. The believer in Democracy does not deny that totali-tarian methods may sometimes win quicker re-turns, but he distrusts the politics of impatience and coercion, doubts the value and stability of the best such means can achieve, and is passion-ately convinced that no external or material suc-cess is worth the sacrifice of freedom. Whatever its object, whatever its chances of victory, an ideological crusade would be alien to the spirit of Democracy. Every war is a war against Demo-cracy. More than that. The outbreak of hostili-ties is itself a defeat for Democracy. In war "Government by the People." Commands take the place of discussion. On the field of battle the less wise decision instantly made, issued as an order, and obeyed without question, is always preferable to a wiser decision attained at the cost of protracted discussion. All war is totalitarian in method. And in modern warfare the whole country becomes a field of battle. Free choice disappears from farm and factory. The Press is muzzled, since secrets must not be re-vealed to the enemy. Youth, because of that very adaptability which makes its freedom of choice os glorions and full of hope, is reduc old and the rich who manage to retain some vestige of freedom.

To those who do not understand Democracy the attitude of democratic states towards war is puzzling. Their intense reluctance to take up arms seems pusillanimous; and when war comes and the people who shrank from it display that "deliberate valour," which is a baffled enemy seeks for an explanation of the contrast in the hypothesis of perfidy. But in fact there is no contradiction. It is just because Peace is so precious to Democracy that Democracies show this unbending determination in cracies show this unbending determination in war, for the outbreak of war is itself a stinging outrage to the democratic ideal and as such steels the will to endure. Democratic states have a power of endurance unattainable by nations whose ardour feeds upon emotion and whose political impatience makes them dependent upon the gratification provided by rapid success.

" firm and unmoved With dread of death to flight or foul retreat,'

the gratification provided by rapid success. But the peace which is precious to Demo-cracy is something more than avoidance of war. In the political life of a democratic people, free-dom of discussion and free criticism of govern-ments are essential; but when international rela-tions are strained and nations are suspicious of one another, much has to be done in secret, and Democracy is impaired. When preparation for possible war is a main concern of the state, the spirit of war which makes this necessary is already in many ways undermining the bases of democratic government. Democracy is on the defensive, and even in retreat, under such condi-tions. But it belongs to Democracy to advance. For after all we are only on the road to Demo-cracy. "Government by the People, for the People "is a phrase which may serve to describe very roughly the form and method of govern-ment to a social ideal. It implies an educated people and it implies a concentration of govern-ment to a social ideal. It implies an educated people and it implies an educated people and it implies. But thoughts and resources of the nation are absorbed by a race in armaments. For that reason, too, the peace which Democracy reeds is more than avoidance of war. If the world is to become, in President Wilson's words, "safe for democracy," it must become, in the fullest sense, what his suc-cessor has described as " a world of neighbours." It is part of the faith and hope of Democracy that that ideal is not unattainable and that the attain-ing of it should be the aim of us all. But the peace which is precious to Demo-
