The success of the exhibition of "Treasures of the 18th Century" held last year in the magnificent setting of the Château of Nyon, on the shores of Lake Geneva and 12 miles from the town of Geneva, has prompted the Nyon Study Circle to organise this year, from June 14th to August 17th, an exhibition entitled "Treasures of the First Empire", under the patronage of the French Ambassador in Berne.

The French National Museums (Versailles, La Malmaison, the Louvre, the Arts Décoratifs, the National Library and the National Archives), as well as Prince Napoléon, have agreed to collaborate in making this exhibition a success. The Napoléon Museum at Arenenberg and other Swiss museums will similarly offer their co-operation. Prince Napoléon has willingly made available several relics, including a uniform, the Coronation cloak, a "Petit Chapeau" and a sword. In addition, a complete room of the exhibition will be devoted to the celebrated china of Nyon, including the famous 300-piece service which belonged to Queen Caroline.

A service Strasbourg-Geneva-Nice is already running, linking Alsace, Switzerland and the Riviera.

ROUNDAABOUT SWITZERLAND by Derek Meakin

My main object in visiting Davos in this latest "Roundabout" tour of Switzerland was to see for myself something of the ambitious Ministry of Health experiment in sending National Health Service patients there for free TB treatment.

Nearly 250 patients a year are now going to Davos for what I am told is almost a certain cure, and I estimate they cost the British taxpayer between £1,500 and £2,000 a week.

When the scheme started last October many people at home asked whether it was worth the cost when Health Service expenditure was already reaching such giant proportions. But anyone who goes to Davos and sees the progress now being made by these once-doomed sufferers will agree that no cost would be too great to put them back on the road to health.

Many of them had never even seen the inside of an English sanatorium. Not that all the sanatoria are full. The trouble is that through lack of nurses, beds are lying empty while TB cases are being left to die at home.

In Switzerland there is no such shortage. The Ministry was able to completely take over the whole of the six-floor Angleterre sanatorium and obtain the use of a further 80 beds in the luxury Park sanatorium. There, two doctors, who are noted for their skill in Part of the resort of Davos, where TB sufferers from Britain are being nursed back to health. In this article—the sixth in the present series—Derek Meakin tells of the big Ministry of Health experiment that is costing between £1,500 and £2,000 a week.
