The Swiss Government has informed Parliament that membership of the Neutral Nations Commissions in Korea had so far cost the country 5,500,000 francs

(about £458,000) and the belligerents did not intend to pay back any of it.

In a 100-page report on Korea, the Government said: "There is no doubt that the mission offered to us in Korea gave us the opportunity to prove that neutrality can still serve the cause of peace through co-operation in peaceful international tasks, even though they may be thankless, difficult, and fraught with risks".

Details have been issued in Berne of a revised Bill giving the Federal Government exceptional powers for the economic defence of the country in the event of war being imminent. It displaces earlier drafts — that of 1952 which was criticized as too authoritarian and centralizing, and that of 1954 which was condemned as too timorous.

The new draft has 41 articles, and is accompanied by an explanatory message running to 64 pages. It starts from the premise that a nation's capacity to resist aggression depends not only on its armed forces
