The Federal Supreme Court, sitting in Berne, pronounced its judgment in the case of Police Inspector Max Ulrich, who was charged with espionage and violation of official secrecy.

Ulrich, who had pleaded guilty, was sentenced for treason and breach of secrecy to two and a half years' imprisonment less 365 days already spent under arrest; he was deprived of his citizen's rights for two years, and forbidden for ten years to hold any public office. Ulrich was also ordered to pay the expenses of the trial and the investigations leading to it, and to be immediately dismissed from the Federal Police.

Judge Theodor Albrecht, president of the court, said in summing-up that Ulrich had admitted his guilt. He said Ulrich maintained he had acted in order to get back certain documents which he alleged the late René Dubois, former Attorney-General who committed suicide in March 1957, had handed over to the French intelligence service. "It has never been proved that Dubois, in fact, did hand over these documents," Judge Albrecht said.

Ulrich had done great harm to the prestige and confidence of the Swiss Federal Police and the office of the Attorney-General, the Judge said, and the suicide of Dubois had nothing whatsoever to do with this loss of confidence.

Ulrich admitted during the trial that he gave the French intelligence service information concerning North Africans in Switzerland at the time of the Suez crisis, but maintained he acted in the interests of the Swiss security service.

The finest precision clock ever built was unveiled recently at Neuchâtel, Switzerland's traditional watchmakers' workshop. 'Lachesis', as it was baptised by its creators, is the first to measure time in accordance with the extremely constant oscillation of ammonia molecules. It even exceeds in accuracy the quartz clock, which had been the best so far. 'Lachesis' will be an exhibit in the Swiss pavilion at the Brussels World Fair.

The Swiss Post Office, in an endeavour to let its clients benefit by technical developments as soon as tests have been successfully passed, has recently introduced the new "Autoruf". Two VHF Stations situated on the Chasseral (nr. Bienne) and the Säntis (Eastern Switzerland) receive signals dialled on the ordinary telephone apparatus and pass these on to motor-cars equipped with a receiver tuned in to the special wave-length. All sets receive the signal but only the intended receiver will produce an optical or acoustic reaction. The motorist will then ring up a pre-arranged telephone number. The system has great advantages for doctors, haulage contractors, maintenance engineers, commercial travellers, etc.

The world's highest building made of bricks will soon be completed in the Zurich suburb of Schwamendingen (population 28,000), it was announced recently at a meeting of the Swiss Brick Manufacturers' Association. The building will be 175 feet high and will contain sixty-eight flats in eighteen storeys. A pioneer in the field of brick building, Mr. A. Gfeller, the Bale architect who designed Bale's three model thirteen-storey buildings in 1949, said that bricks are "economical and suitable" for the construction of large apartment houses, whereas for tall office buildings steel skeletons have proved more successful. There are four large factories in Switzerland which produce a special type of bricks meeting all requirements of tall buildings.
