THE LE CORBUSIER CENTRE

The last creation of the great Swiss architect Le Corbusier, whose real name was Charles-Edouard Jeanneret, is nearing completion on the park-studded shore of Lake Zurich. The bold structure, credit for the construction of which goes to Zurich interior decorator and art-gallery owner Heidi Weber, was developed and constantly improved by Le Corbusier over a span of thirty years. It consists of a free floating roof over an independent complex of rooms. The dimensions of the structure were determined according to the "Modulor" system, which Le Corbusier developed based on human proportions. The "Centre Le Corbusier" will house the master's legacy of tapestries, sculptures, sketches, gouaches and oil paintings, as well as rooms for special exhibitions, lectures and other events. In accordance with Le Corbusier's conception and the Centre's construction of pre-fabricated elements, the building was begun with the roof, under the protection of which the remainder of the structure is now being completed. It is hoped to dedicate the Centre on 6th October, which would have been Le Corbusier's 79th birthday.

FEDERAL BRASS MUSIC FESTIVAL

The 24th Federal Brass Music Festival began in Aarau on 10th June. The town's population, the authorities and the industrial concerns saw to it that the Aargau Capital looked its best, and streets and buildings were richly decorated with flowers and flags.

A salute of twenty-two guns was fired at 7 p.m. to open the Festival officially. A military band of ninety men gave a first concert in the evening. The contest which covered concert and marching music took place in eight different halls and on three Marschmusikstrecken. The Federal Music Flag was taken to Aarau on Saturday morning, having been kept in Zurich, the place of the last Festival. The flag was carried in procession to the Kirchplatz, accompanied by groups in historic costumes.

A welcome thunderstorm brought a little coolness on Sunday morning, but again it was a hot day. The bands played throughout Sunday, and thousands of spectators and experts followed their performances. The 190 bands took part in a "Star March".

A week later, another batch of brass bands from all parts of the country, once more about 190, gathered in Aarau for the second part of the Festival. On Saturday afternoon, a colourful pageant procession was organised in which all the cantonal music flags were carried to the Schachen, the centre of the Festival.

A little rain on Sunday was welcome. At the "Schloesschen", there was a reception of the guests of honour, among them Federal President Schaffner and the Presidents of the National Council and the Council of States. After lunch, the two prize-winning composers, Prof. Paul Huber, St. Gall, and Jean Daetwyler, Sierre, were honoured, and after another "Star March", the closing ceremony took place in the marquee, the rain having come down in earnest by then. With a speech by the President of the Confederation and the announcement of the results, the 24th Eidgenoessisches Musikfest came to an end.
