THE INITIATIVE THAT FAILED (continued from page 3)

economy could not ensure that wage earners of little means would have the best deal.

The many opponents to the initiative had however little difficulty in demonstrating the fallacy of these suppositions. They showed that contractors and building societies made small profit margins. They also disproved the reigning belief that speculation was the main factor in making the cost of housing soar and insisted that speculators were a minority. Finally, a compulsory action by the state in the field of housing would have broken the normal play of liberal economic forces and produced more problems than it would have solved. By voting down the initiative, the Swiss people not only showed some understanding in economics, they also marked their confidence in the Federal Council and Parliament.
