IRAN is eager to expand trade and economic links with Switzerland, a visiting delegation has revealed in Berne. The top-level government team – in Berne for exploratory talks with Swiss government, banking and industrial representatives – told Swiss Radio International that Iran was particularly interested in such expansion because Switzerland had not joined last year's US-led trade boycott of the country.

The visit was the first such Iranian mission to the West since the overthrow of the Shah two years ago. Asked about assets reportedly owned and deposited in Switzerland by the late Shah, the delegation said it hoped these would still be returned to the Iranian people – “to whom they rightfully belong.”

Switzerland has advised Iran that it should use normal legal channels in seeking a return of any such assets.

MORE than 100,000 signatures have been collected in favour of co-ordinating Switzerland's cantonal school systems – which means that a nationwide vote will have to be held on the issue. The initiative calls for a new article in the federal constitution, under which the school year would have to begin at the same time in all cantons.

The year currently begins in the autumn in French and Italian-speaking Switzerland – and in the spring in most German-speaking cantons.

THE wearing of safety belts for motorists will be compulsory in Switzerland from July – three months later than originally planned. Motorcyclists will also have to wear crash helmets from July. Cantonal authorities have requested that both measures enter into force on the same date.

The controversial new legislation was narrowly approved by the Swiss electorate in a nationwide vote last year.

THE “Swiss Psalm” is to remain Switzerland's national anthem. It was introduced in the 1960s as a provisional replacement for the former anthem, which had the same melody as Britain's “God Save the Queen”.

Critics claim the Psalm's melody is difficult to sing and its words pseudo-religious – but the government now says that all efforts to find an alternative anthem have failed.

SWISS working hours are the longest in Western Europe, according to a survey by the International Labour Organisation in Geneva. The ILO survey – based on 1979 figures – reports that Swiss work an average of 45.4 hours per week.

The country with Europe's shortest working week? Sweden, with 35.7 hours.

FEDERAL civil servants in Switzerland are to receive an average three per cent pay rise from next January. Their unions had asked for five per cent. Highest-paid personnel will receive no increases, but lowest-salaried staff will be paid nearly six per cent more.

Apart from cost-of-living adjustments, federal civil service salaries have not been increased since 1972. Cost of the increase – Sfr. 180 million or £40 million a year.
