First quality tie fabrics

In the early days of the last century, the Regency bucks were regular «Macaronies», exquisite fops, as Sheridan would have said, decked up in their extravagant cravats. They—and their counterparts on the continent—wore impressive quantities of muslin of immaculate whiteness, a fashion that was a boon to certain cotton mills in eastern

Switzerland. As it increased in wealth, the century of the industrial revolution increased in respectability too, and heightened its air of gravity with funeral black ties. Luckily, the oarsmen of the Thames came to rescue our forebears from the enveloping gloom and brought into fashion the small sailor-knot tie with its gaily coloured stripes. In accordance with the traditional way with men's fashions, the sports fashion very soon became the fashion, and ties gave the well-dressed man infinite possibilities of adding a touch of fantasy to his otherwise sombre attire.

The Swiss silk industry naturally kept up with this trend and adapted itself all the more easily as it had already for a long time been specialising in the production of small, exclusive, high quality lines.

Even regarded from the point of view of world production, the consumption of tie fabrics can never reach gigantic proportions. Admittedly in countries subject to the influence of western civilisation, the tie is no longer considered the distinctive badge of a privileged upper class; the general rise in the standard of living has increased the number of men for whom the wearing of a tie, even if limited to certain hours of the day or even certain days of the week, is a sign of having arrived at a higher level of social awareness. The quantities produced however are limited by the small size of the object itself. Furthermore, in the smarter categories, the customer expects a certain originality, which compels tie manufacturers—and consequently tie fabric producers too—to vary their assortment. It is therefore quite impossible to mass-produce articles of this type.

It is precisely this limitation of the yardages made and its inevitable consequence, the necessity of creating a very large number of designs, which make for the superiority of Swiss tie fabrics. Because the strength of Swiss tie manufacturers stems from the tradition behind them, this does not mean however that these industrialists are hide-bound, incapable of producing novelties and adapting themselves to technical progress and the changing demands of the consumer. However, even in the cheaper ranges, they adhere firmly to the principle of quality.

The material most used by Swiss manufacturers is pure silk, a noble, precious material which makes ties that are firm and elastic at the same time, ties that are as pleasant to tie as to behold; a material which obliges the manufacturer to maintain high technical and artistic standards. All the Swiss manufacturers referred to here use silk, most of them far more than any other material, for reasons of preference and taste. However they also work with other materials such as Rhodia organsine, for example, and to a lesser extent rayons and synthetic fibres, mainly Terylene and Tergal, which are very popular at present for a certain category. We wish to stress that in spite of their versatility and their capacity to compete, Swiss manufacturers refuse to work with the inferior qualities, these materials not being worth the trouble taken to set up the machines.

When we examine the different types of fabrics and designs, we notice that most weavers produce a very wide range. In the plain fabrics, apart from the traditional textures such as faille, satin, royal and gauze, the most popular are shot and structural effects. In addition to the figured fabrics, there are the traditional pepper and salt designs, interesting all-over patterns including the ever-popular paisleys as well as spots, checks, houndstooth checks, etc. Stripes are still in fashion, ranging from the most subdued to the gayest novelties in which the stripes consist of jacquard motifs standing out against a plain ground, and combinations of satin bands on a moiré ground, etc. The latest trends in certain markets however are for vertical designs generally situated at the side of the tie, and «set» designs which may vary from one small isolated design to a veritable panoramic scene taking up the whole of the front of the tie; we must also mention the shaded tones, the «panel» style and other original novelties. As can be seen from our illustrations, Swiss weavers are very good at this type of work, which they can carry out in various materials and a wide range of colours: Swiss manufacturers generally work with almost a hundred different shades, which enables them to produce an infinite number of combinations.

All this goes to show the great interest presented by Swiss tie fabrics, which have succeeded in establishing themselves even on producer markets—everywhere in fact where the qualities of good workmanship, elegance, distinction and exclusiveness are in demand.
